Laura Secord Statue - Queenston Canada

The quiet town of Queenston on the Niagara Peninsula is home to one of the most dramatic scenes in Canadian history. In these lands, which bear the traces of the War of 1812, a small but powerful monument rises: the Laura Secord Statue. This female figure, who holds a deep place in Canada's national memory, impresses visitors with her story as much as with her statue. Laura Secord is a civilian heroine who passed into Canadian history with her courage and determination, walking thirty kilometers in a single night to inform British forces of an American attack. But the statue dedicated to her does not only tell this dramatic story; it also invites us to question how Canadian national identity was shaped, the place of women in historiography, and how a society selects and exalts its own heroes.

Who is Laura Secord?

Laura Ingersoll Secord was born in 1775 in Massachusetts. Her family later immigrated to Canada, and Laura settled in Queenston after marrying James Secord. The War of 1812 was a conflict between the United States and Great Britain fought on Canadian soil, playing a decisive role in the shaping of Canadian national identity. Laura Secord stepped onto the stage of history at one of the most critical moments of this war.

In June 1813, American soldiers were billeted in the Secord family home. Laura learned from the conversations of these soldiers that American forces would soon launch a raid on a British position. Her husband, James, had been wounded in a previous skirmish and could not undertake this task. Laura set out alone to deliver the information to the British commander. This journey, covering approximately thirty kilometers, was completed overnight while passing through forests and swamps and avoiding enemy patrols. The information she reached was decisive in the British forces' victory against the Americans at the Battle of Beaver Dams.

Physical Characteristics and Artistic Composition of the Statue

The Laura Secord Statue in Queenston presents a powerful composition designed to reflect her historical identity and that famous journey. The statue depicts Laura in a determined stance, looking forward; the perseverance and orientation in the figure's posture recall that long night and that brave decision. Its realistic proportions are in harmony with the attire of a Canadian civilian woman of the period; the long skirt and details specific to the women's clothing of the era are carefully crafted on the statue.

The pedestal of the statue was designed with a material and form consistent with the geographical and historical context of Queenston. The inscription on it conveys Laura Secord's identity and the event of 1813 briefly but effectively. The size of the statue is neither overly monumental nor negligible in scale; this human scale established with the viewer moves the figure away from being a part of cold history and closer to the feeling of meeting an intimate human being. With its location within the green and open texture of Queenston Heights Park, the statue is highly compatible with its natural surroundings, standing as if it were a part of these lands.

Evaluated from an artistic perspective, the Laura Secord Statue bears traces of the romantic realism movement. It exhibits the typical characteristics of 19th and 20th-century Canadian monumental sculpture: the figure is not idealized or exaggerated, but it is also not an ordinary portrait. This approach of humanizing the hero removes the statue from being a mere symbol of victory and allows it to establish an emotional bond with the visitor.

Tracing History in the Niagara Region

Queenston is a destination that stays in the shadow of Niagara Falls but stands out with its own historical depth. Starting from the Laura Secord Statue and proceeding through the walking trails of Queenston Heights Park allows one to discover both the natural beauty and the historical layers of the region together. Since a portion of the route Secord followed passes through these parks, some guided tours symbolically re-enact that historic walk.

The nearby Laura Secord Homestead, the historic home where her family lived, is also open to visitors. At this site, it is possible to closely discover the living conditions of the period and the story of the Secord family. The route starting from Queenston and extending to Niagara-on-the-Lake offers a complete Niagara experience, combining one of Canada's best-preserved historic towns, award-winning wineries, and breathtaking views of the falls. The Laura Secord Statue remains the link most deeply connected to history within this experience.

Source URL: https://www.heykel.org/en/monument/laura-secord-statue-queenston-canada/
Workshop: Heykel.org - Publication Date: 2026-04-17 12:56:36 - PDF Date: 29/11/2026